

Fair Use Doctrine:

1. Based on the purpose and nature of the use of the memes, which is for education purposes, this use case scenario falls under the category of fair use. Janet is not using the comics to make more money but to use them as teaching aids.
2. The comics being used are widely distributed throughout newspapers and the internet and is not heavily guarded content. The creators of the comics might even encourage people to use their work in projects and slideshows to market themselves.
3. Janet is only using a small amount of content and this is a good argument that her usage falls under the fair use doctrine. It's not as though Janet is using all the Dilbert comics ever made.
4. By using the comics and memes to promote their essential purpose, comedy, in a boring presentation she is helping the popularity and desirability to find and look at more of the comics rise. She is basically giving free demos of what you might expect if you look more into purchasing newspapers with these comics or paying to download and see the memes.

In conclusion, based on the four aspects of the fair use doctrine it is easy to determine that this is fair use of the comic strip material.
